Universities accross the UK are now researching the subject of ghosts and other paranormal phenomena

Dr Richard Broughton, from Northampton University's Centre for the Study of Anomalous Psychological Processes declares-

"I am firmly convinced that there are phenomena here that need to be investigated and may provide a radically new view of the capabilities of human consciousness," he told the Times Higher Education Supplement"

Professor Chris French, head of the Anomalistic Psychology Research Unit at Goldsmiths University of London, said "most people believe in this stuff" and went further in saying "If psychologists have nothing to say on this topic, they are missing out on a broad part of the human experience"

The statements by Dr Broughton and Professor French and the decision to research the subject certainly adds credence to the idea that paranormal phenomena exists all around us and that humans are capable of tuning in to it.

If millions of people all over the world believe in a god or follow a religion then it stands to reason that those same people could hardly deny the existence of paranormal phenomena. The existence of a god has never been proved ...does this mean that god does not exist ?
